Democrats Have Nothing to Hope For Protection Meets with Favor in Japan Inless It Be Financial

There is an intimation that the strike comfort to the democratic politicians. If may be presumed, indeed, that those stave off to 1904 all labor conflicts which fog in the general husiness or political situation as it now exists has the slightest promise of success for the democrats, says the St. Louis Globe-Demoerat. So far as any democratic politician can see at this time. President Roosevelt's majority in 1904 will be at least as large as President McKinley's was in 1900.

A labor disturbance on a large scale, however, would change the situation, as the democrats believe. It was the Homestead strike of 1892 that hit the republicans in that year, and defeated Harrison for reelection. Other causes-the belief that prosperity was fixed anyhow and that democratic success could not affect it, and the desire which many people always have for a change of some sort-had some influence on the camelection in that year.
